Chartered Global Management Accountants (CGMA) Releases Report with Genpact, "New Skills, Existing Talent," on the Value and Future of the Finance Function

Finance to play an increasingly strategic role, not only driving efficiency and effectiveness, but also creating capacity for "partnering role" with businesses

NEW YORK, Sept. 12, 2012 /PRNewswire/ -- Genpact Limited (NYSE: G), a global leader in business process management and technology services, today announced the release of the 2012 Chartered Global Management Accountant (CGMA) report that it has sponsored, "New Skills, Existing Talents," which surveyed senior personnel in the U.S. and Europe. This unique research sought the views of both finance personnel (1,354 respondents) and their internal non-finance customers (871 respondents) about finance's responsibilities and performance, in addition to the function's ability to take on a broader role within the corporation.

Key insights from the report include:

- Some finance functions are being enhanced to contribute more to their organization's success by conducting their core activities more efficiently, providing better management information and performing a more influential role in management.
- More than 90% of both sets of respondents feel their finance function has become more efficient through the use of standardized, automated processes.
- 85% of finance respondents and 87% of non-finance respondents indicate that they measure effectiveness at least "to some extent," reflecting the trend for the finance function becoming more of a business partner, driving business goals.

According to Bill Kurtz, CFO and Chief Commercial Officer, Bloom Energy (U.S.), "Finance is not about just keeping score, but helping to make the score better. We are in a unique position because we see all the information relating to how the business is performing, and we can use that information to help drive the business to be better on its bottom line, and in terms of its long-term growth."

Chris Ling, Financial Controller at British Gas said, "The rate at which the business world is changing is forcing everything to change faster, so it is our job as finance professionals to make sure that we are supporting the business as best we can, and as fast as we can...One way in which you can tell how respected a finance function is within a company is to see where the Finance Director or CFO sits in relation to the CEO. In businesses where finance is well respected, they sit next to each other. Finance is seen as the right hand person, there to provide commercial insight, analysis and understanding, while helping forge sensible commercial business solutions to any problem."

"This report offers clear insights on what it takes to transform finance functions,"said Shantanu Ghosh, senior vice president, Practices, Solutions and Transitions, Genpact. "It shows that business leaders no longer solely want accountants in finance roles. To succeed, they need finance functions which deliver insights and recommendations that build value far beyond management data and accurate regulatory filings."

Ghosh continued, "Genpact's experience and benchmarking shows that leading organizations are already transforming finance's role by focusing on effectiveness beyond efficiency. Most often they are creating a finance operating model that streamlines transactional operations through centralization and standardization, leverages global talent pools, measures the team on its ability to drive end-to-end effectiveness, and creates capacity for the finance organization to focus on business partnering. While each transformation journey is unique, many are gaining from using both in-house and external partner talent and expertise to concentrate on process-oriented thinking, including leveraging benchmarks and best practices."

Ghosh offers the following recommendations to finance teams aiming to become more strategic:

- Leverage developments in information technology and management accounting tools to lead on exploiting "big data." Focus on generating forward-looking information and insights that enable decision making and action.
- Play a proactive role in understanding and linking the intangible non-financial data with the financials. Work to translate these links into insights to allow the organizations to make more effective decisions.
- Continually develop your commercial, communication and influencing skills to contribute actionable insights, help manage performance and guide strategy.

Genpact continues to provide thought leadership on finance and accounting strategy through a variety of channels, including a blog series. In support of this finance study and other recent research including its CFO benchmarking survey, Genpact also recently conducted a four-part webinar series, "The Future of Finance," which explores the options, opportunities and challenges finance leaders are facing in their quest to contribute further value to their organizations. *A*ll four webinars can be accessed at: http://www.genpact.com/home/campaign/future-of-finance?tabname=Future of Finance Webinar series .
